MICHAEL FINNISSY AT 70
THE PIANO MUSIC (9)
IAN PACE – Piano
Recital at Deptford Town Hall, Goldsmith’s College, London

Thursday December 1st, 2016, 6:00 pm

The event will begin with a discussion between Michael Finnissy and Ian Pace on the Verdi Transcriptions.

MICHAEL FINNISSY  Verdi Transcriptions Books 1-4 (1972-2005)

6:15 pm    Books 1 and 2:

XXXII Aria: ‘Cielo, piетoso, rendila’, Simon Boccanegra (Act 2)
XXXIII. Aria: ‘Tu che la vanità conoscesti’, Don Carlo (Act 5)
XXXIV. (a) Ballet No. 3: ‘Chanson Grecque’ (Cancone Greca);
(b) Scena: ‘Una gran nube turba’, Otello (Act 3, Finale)
XXXV. ‘Brava! Quelle corna saranno la mio gioia!’, Falstaff (Act 3, Part 1)
XXXVII. I. ‘Requiem Aeternam’, Messa da Requiem

Verdi Transcriptions – Programme Note by Michael Finnissy

Transcribing sound into a written form (notation) involves making significant choices. The choices can colour the ongoing exploration of that sound as ‘composition’. All the written symbols chosen are potential material, though - in practice - some are prioritised, others overlooked. The processing of the material is, basically, repetition plus varying degrees of alteration (variation). These ‘low level’ processes accumulate into ever longer structures, also ‘composition’. Other considerations, more or less aesthetic - perhaps also political in a broad sense, influence the progress of this accumulation. Some of these considerations (a lot of them learned and not challenged) are liberating others are confining, either can be useful. The eventual totality, concept and design, bear traces of a ‘journey’ (thought to page) - and will, itself, be experienced (by listening) as a sort of journey. All of this is relatively (less or more) free from intruding cultural influences and prejudices, limitations of self, knowledge and technique.

In transcribing Verdi it might seem as if half, or more, of the work had already been done - however, once it is found, or chosen, as ‘material’ the work (composition) becomes the same. None of these pieces assume the original dramatic (Verdian) context, nor is their sound world (voices and orchestra) overtly imitated by the piano. The rhetoric, musical logic and idiom, of nineteenth century opera occasionally surfaces - in a haze of nostalgi a, corrupted, even satirised. The music is perhaps ‘theatrical’ in a general sense.

The main topics addressed by the composition are: transforming the found object; sampling as continuity-script; faking - since ‘pastiche’ might already be present.

A selective history of these topics - Marcel Duchamp, Readymades aided 1913-, initially by adding small dots to a pre-existing found print; the assemblage. The re-configured, alienated ‘everyday’ object becomes a totem. Signing your name - R.Mutt 1917. Duchamp photographed ‘en travesti’ as Rrose Selavy in 1921 [MF as GV 1972-2005]. Duchamp as re-viewed (parodied?) by Julian Schnabel. Helmut Lachenmann, Tanzsuite mit Deutschlandlied, 1980, trace elements of a loved/despised culture. What’s on T.V.? What used to be on the radio? What’s out there? Verdi - and who else? “F for Fake” a film by Orson Welles. Picasso, 347 Gravures - 16.3.68 to 5.10.68, a majority of them ‘derived from’
- fantasised out of and away from - Velasquez’ Las Meninas, and forming an erotic circus where you watch the artist watching his model. Andy Warhol borrowing da Vinci’s Last Supper, or Roy Lichtenstein appropriating the nineteenth century ‘classics’.

I began writing this piece in 1972, whilst still teaching and accompanying at the London School of Contemporary Dance. I was attempting to more painstakingly, more obviously, isolate and explore an idea which dominates most of my music. This idea being the mixing, or synthesis, of different (perhaps even opposing) types of music - different modalities (tonal, atonal, pentatonic, microtonal) and different ‘generic’ or ‘historical’ styles.

This is not a particularly original idea. Bach was doing much the same in describing his Suites as English or French (his ‘own’ manner being German). Debussy mixes whole-tone, pentatonic and tonal elements in the same piece. A large amount of ‘domestic’ chamber-music re-creates operatic and orchestral rhetoric and repertoire, either by appropriation or imitation.

I also wanted to experiment with transcription - and chose what was, by convention, the most obvious material: nineteenth-century opera. I had already tried this once before with Donizetti, in an abortive Donaueschingen commission from Heinrich Strobel (Re-Organised Elements of Opera). This wasn’t an original idea either - Busoni opens his Die Brautwahl by quoting Rossini. Pousseur (Votre Faust), Berio (Sinfonia) and Bernd-Alois Zimmermann had - more recently - written music in which ‘citations’ and ‘memories’ played a large part.

The first attempt was to START with pastiche Verdi and gradually become me. More or less the opposite of what finally happened - which was to CONCLUDE with him having begun with me. However the opening seven parodies of nineteenth-century operatic transcriptions that I wrote were too similar, they did not ‘launch’ what was obviously a rather grandiose conception very effectively. I abandoned these and put the piece on one side, working on it only fitfully.

In 1977 I wrote ‘English Country-Tunes’, arguably with much the same initial scenario, but with English folk music as material rather than Verdi.

I was also working on a set of piano studies at this time, trying always to broaden the scope (perhaps ‘drama’ and typology) of my work. I was also spending a lot of time travelling around Europe for concerts, and playing for the Royal Opera ballet (classes and rehearsals). This latter proximity to 19th century opera worked against, rather than for, my Verdi project - and it was only after I’d spent two extended periods in Australia, and when I started University teaching that I’d created sufficient distance and objectivity to proceed with it. In some ways the (Verdi) material was no longer the point. The point was the different sorts of thing one could do to transform it.

These ‘transformations’ are quite rudimentary. Firstly one can take the constituent notes of a Verdi line, adding two or three notes together (to make dyads and triads), and find oneself with very different compositional matter. One can isolate a single ‘figure’ from somewhere in the accompaniment, and bring it forward as a structural determinant. One can variously fragment and blow apart Verdi’s texture by octave- and other sorts of transposition, shifting registers around in ways quite different to the original. Verdi’s original can be used as a ‘cantus firmus’ in one hand, while the other hand superimposed contrasting, complimentary or contradictory material. A particular sequence of durations can be allied to different sets of pitches (a technique from isorhythmic motets of the late mediaeval period). Busoni as transcriber can be invoked - it was, after all his essay on Liszt’s transcription which had bolstered my resolve to continue with this notion. Busoni’s transcription of North American Indian music (Indianisches Tagebuch, erster Teil) is the reference-point for the 8th transcription of this cycle, his 1st Sonatina the reference-point for the 17th transcription. The re-arrangement Busoni made of (fugato) material from the 1st Sonatina in his cycle An die Jugend informs the latter half of the transcription from La forza del destino, while the penultimate transcription (Falstaff) has as its template the first fugue from the Fantasia Contrappuntistica - itself a transcription of the first Contrapunctus in Bach’s Art of Fugue.

It was always my intention to refer at least once to the entire canon of Verdi’s operas, including the initial versions of Macbeth, Simon Boccanegra and Don Carlos. But my energy and resourcefulness again collapsed after completing the first section (nine operas), with an assortment of other transcriptions (including the long Don Carlo one) fully or partially finished. I published this ‘torso’ in 1995.

In 2004 I had a sabbatical, my first ever from University teaching, and I decided to try to fully complete the work - having meanwhile learned a little from the experience of writing the Gershwin Arrangements/More Gershwin, a less overtly formalistic approach to found material and re-interpreting it, and the two other large cyclic pieces Folklore and History of Photography in Sound.

I had already decided that the cycle would be equally divided - 4 sections each treating 9 ‘operas’ (the fourth set includes the String Quartet and the Requiem). Now I determined that the first two sections and the last two would be in the proportion 1+:1:2:2+ (more accurately 30:20:45:75 minutes). Also that the shape of each section would be the same - the ‘cantus firmus’ always fifth, the Busoni homage always eighth and so on. This repetitiveness would balance the diversity of the originals, though this diversity is perhaps already subsumed by similarities in Verdi’s melodic and harmonic writing, slowly metamorphosing over the thirty-six pieces. The initial number of each of the four sets would gradually rise from the lowest to the highest notes of the piano, and the work as a whole would gradually reveal Verdi ‘pure and simple’ from fragmentation and distortion at the outset.

Verdi Transcriptions – Programme Note by Ian Pace

In 1996, the year of Michael Finnissy’s 50th birthday, I gave a series of six large concerts in London featuring his then-complete piano works. Twenty years later, Finnissy’s output for piano is well over twice that size (the five-and-a-half hour The History of Photography in Sound (1995-2000) alone takes the equivalent of three recitals). This concert is the ninth of a series which will take place over the course of 2016-17, in a variety of locations, featuring Finnissy’s principal piano works, to celebrate his 70th birthday. This music remains as important to me (and as central a part of my own repertoire) as it did twenty years ago, though many ways in which I approach and interpret it – both as performer and scholar – have moved on considerably since then.

The first book of the Verdi Transcriptions was the first work of Finnissy’s that I learned; ever since then these pieces have had a very special place in my affections, notwithstanding the rest of Finnissy’s vast output for the piano, the entirety of which I have performed during the interim period. The work underwent various modifications and additions through the course of its history: for publication in 1995, three ‘fragments’ were added to the then six pieces comprising Book 2. I performed this newly complete set soon after its publication and later recorded it. In 2004-2005, Finnissy undertook a massive expansion and revision of the earlier work. Book 1 is identical with its earlier version, but the earlier Book 2 is a different work to the current book of the same number. The earlier Book 2 contained transcriptions from La forza del destino, Macbeth, Attila, Aida, I masnadieri, and Don Carlo, with the three ‘fragments’ from Simon Boccanegra, La traviata and Aroldo. Practically all the original material occurs in the final cycle, but in various forms: the transcriptions from Macbeth, Aida and Don Carlo all remain in their original form, each now appearing in Book 4, while the transcriptions from La forza, Attila, and I masnadieri have all been expanded with new material intercut into the pieces at various places. The material in the ‘fragments’ generally occurs in the later pieces on those operas (in the case of Boccanegra, in the Book 4 transcription of the later version), but as a relatively small part of more diverse conceptions. One can hopefully assume that, give or take the odd possible future modification of detail, this version constitutes Finnissy’s final word!

Beyond the contemporary ‘culture industry’ view of Verdi, there are many other factors to consider about this music. Not least of these are the explicitly political dimensions of the work of both Verdi and his librettists, which despite some rather embarrassing moments, stand up reasonably well in the modern age (in many ways better than that of Wagner, for example). Whilst all of Verdi’s operas prior to La traviata (with the arguable exception of Il Corsaro) have as most of their principal figures members of various ruling classes (Counts, Kings, Holy Roman Emperors, Barons, Dukes, Governors, Doges, noblemen and women, and their families and entourages), Verdi does not simply glorify such an exclusive class, nor necessarily present the particularity of their (privileged) situation as a metaphor for the concerns of all of humanity. On the contrary, both he and his librettists were acutely aware of the flaws, the petty vanities and jealousies, the greed, the hunger for power, that so many such people exhibited in ample measure. Verdi seems to have had little time for the then outdated opera buffa convention of presenting lower class people as figures of fun to be laughed at in a patronising manner by aristocratic and haute bourgeois audiences (such a convention even extends to some extent into Donizetti’s L’Elisir d’amore (1832), though handled somewhat dialectically). On the contrary, those characters of lesser social standing are portrayed both dramatically and musically with great complexity and humanity (for all the vengefulness of Rigoletto, for example, one feels him to be a character of much greater tragic stature than the fickle and vacuous aristocrats he serves). Like Mozart before him, Verdi is rarely happy with idle stereotypes, bringing a markedly individual attitude to generic conventions practically from the outset of his career. The women in Verdi’s early operas tend to exist primarily in terms of their relationships with men (with some exceptions, not least the character of Abigaille in Nabucco or the title role in Giovanna d’Arco), but they are by no means idly subservient in this respect (not least Elvira, forced to fight off unwanted advances by two of her three suitors in Ernani). Again in La traviata, we are presented with a female lead role (based on the real life character of Marie Duplessis) whose independence of purpose - at least at the outset, when she desires not to abandon her life as a courtesan in favour of marriage - shocked the audiences and censors of the time, forcing the Teatro Fenice to reset the production in the early 18th century (rather than in modern times as originally intended) so as to make it seem more ‘distant’.

It would be foolish to try and present Verdi as some sort of far-seeing socialist radical, of course; he was a bourgeois composer for a bourgeois audience, but at a time before the Italian bourgeoisie had become a thoroughly conservative class; sections of them continued to adhere to some radical ideas. Verdi had both a keen interest and passionate convictions with respect to contemporary events; many of those numerous operas set in distant times served as metaphors for contemporary political concerns. But one should not overlook the more questionable aspects of the works as well. The rather sentimental nationalism to be found in arguably in Nabucco, Giovanna d’Arco, La battaglia di Legnano and Les vêpres siciliennes, which of course had a powerful meaning in the context of the lead-up to the Risorgimento, looks at best somewhat quaint from a 20th or 21st century perspective. The tyrannical role assigned to the Muslim character Acciano in I Lombardi, or the Emir of Ramla in Jérusalem, both set at the time of Crusades, with Christian Crusaders as heroes (as is also the case in Aroldo), let alone the fact that in the former opera Acciano’s wife Sofia and son Oronte are redeemed by the fact that they have secretly converted to Christianity, attain new meanings in a post-colonial era in which tensions between the Western and Muslim worlds have exacerbated. The ‘Harem’s Chorus’ in both operas, as a dramatic device to give propagandistic support to the Crusaders, has a new immediacy (though not in the manner imagined at the time) in light of the propaganda accompanying the ‘War on Terror’, a type of propaganda which can be traced back to the very time of the Crusades at least, and has informed Western portrayals of the Islamic world ever since (not least in Mozart’s Die Entführung aus dem Serail). Nor is another Muslim character in Verdi, Otello, portrayed in that much more of a favourable light. Also, one character that may have in an early conception have been intended to be homosexual, Oscar in Un ballo in maschera, constitutes one of the most puerile and vacuous roles in the whole of Verdi’s output.

Verdi’s first sixteen operas were written between 1837 and 1850, a rate of productivity which, while not matching that of Rossini or Donizetti (who produced over 70 operatic works during his 51-year life), is nonetheless remarkable. Verdi would call this period his ‘galley years’. He worked within the conventions of Italian operatic genres from the outset (never completely abandoning them, even in Falstaff), marrying the achievements of Rossini, Bellini and Donizetti to other influences from Mozart or the French grand opera of Meyerbeer, Auber and Halévy. At the same time, his instrumental writing, especially in some of the more chromatically adventurous interludes and introductions, shows a clear debt to Beethoven. Later influences would include Offenbach (in Un ballo in maschera) and even Wagner at places in Otello and Falstaff. The earliest operas, while certainly sometimes patchy in quality, are almost never simply formulaic; each has its own very distinct identity. Characters and their musical portrayals interact with generic conventions, but always with some degree of individuation. Verdi’s musical language is extravagant without too many excursions into empty bombast (compare Verdi’s French opera Jérusalem with much of Meyerbeer, for example). Many of the scenarios are very dark, dealing with motivations of revenge, covetousness, envy, lust for power, and other such human weaknesses. Somehow comic opera eluded Verdi for the most part: only two of his operas, Un giorno and Falstaff are comedies, and each rely on a degree of stereotypical portrayal to make their point.

It is commonly believed that Verdi made his most radical breakthrough with Rigoletto, in which he achieved a newly sophisticated relationship between operatic ‘number’ and dramatic pacing. The first act of Rigoletto is especially striking in this respect, pulling the action forward at a quite bewildering pace by exploiting the interactions between different characters’ material (especially in the ‘Vendetta del pazzo’ section which Finnissy sets). This approach to the interplay between the ‘numbers’ and the sections connecting them was explored earlier in the final act of Luisa Miller; furthermore, Verdi’s gift for conveying dramatic motion is demonstrated from the very beginning in his signature pieces for vocal ensemble, where different characters express conflicting emotions and motivations, the interplay between which drives the drama forward. This is familiar in such landmark numbers as the famous Quartet from Rigoletto or the incomparable Septet with Chorus in Act 3 of Otello, but such possibilities can already be experienced as early as in the brilliant Quintet from Act 1 of Un giorno di regno or the Septet with Chorus in Ernani, which Finnissy also sets.

The post-Rigoletto operas are generally well-known, Il trovatore for its melodic distinctiveness and fascinating opposition between the two female characters, one (Leonora) a lady-in-waiting to a Princess, the other (Azucena) a gypsy woman, La traviata for the radical nature of its subject matter and the underlying tragic qualities of its musical material (even in the more ‘upbeat’ moments), Simon Boccanegra for the seriousness and through-composed music to match the labyrinthine plot, Un ballo in maschera for its exuberance, French influences, and raw evil evinced in the characters of Samuel and Tom, La forza del destino for its many memorable elements within such an extended and multi-faceted story (though this work has had its detractors), Don Carlos for the subtlety of its characterisation and the channelled reserve of the French idiom, Aida for its blending of dignity with passion (such as in the incomparably moving final scene), both Otello and Falstaff for their fusion of all Verdi’s previous achievements and subtlety of music and characterisation, operas which can arguably stand their own alongside the works of Wagner, whose rival conception of music drama was rarely far from Verdi’s thoughts as the German composer’s reputation grew.

Finnissy’s transcriptions encompass all of Verdi’s twenty-eight operas in chronological sequence, as well as the String Quartet and Messa da Requiem to conclude the cyc. The precise number of Verdi’s operas is however, debatable, for Jerusalem is a reworking of much of I Lombardi, Aroldo has a similar relationship to Stiffelio (though in both cases the changes are quite substantial), whereas Macbeth, Simon Boccanegra, La forza del destino and Don Carlo(s) exist in multiple versions, sometimes with very significant changes (especially with respect to Don Carlo(s)). Attila, a favourite opera of the composer, receives two different transcriptions, as does Rigoletto, whereas Macbeth receives three, or one might almost say four as that at the end of Book 3 is a bipartite structure using both equivalent arias from the 1847 and 1865 versions of the opera. All of these three operas straddle the four books of the cycle. The Book 3 Boccanegra transcription sets the whole of a scene at the end of Act 1 that was omitted from the later version, whilst the Don Carlos transcription uses a selection of little-known material from more obscure versions of the opera.

As Finnissy describes above, there is a commonality of structure between the four books, each containing a first piece that uses closely-backed chords to create a type of para-microtonal effect, shifting up register with each book (these are the transcriptions after Oberto, the second Attila, the second Rigoletto and the final Macbeth), a piece in the fifth position (actually in the fourth in Book 2 – the numbering is slightly altered in this volume) which combines a clearly identifiable tonal melody with a two-part canon in the other hand (the pieces after Ernani, Jerusalem, Boccanegra (1857), and Boccanegra (final 1881 version)), a scherzo-like staccato movement in the fourth position (I Lombardi, I masnadieri, Les vêpres, String Quartet), a more extended fantasia in the sixth position (not really in the short Book 2, but in the works after Foscarì, Aroldo and Don Carlo), and a Busoni-based work in the eight position (Alzira, Stiffelio, La forza del destino and Falstaff). In other pieces, rhythmic, configural or other elements are mirrored in different books – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works – for example, the rhythmic structure of the Giovanna d’Arco transcription is replicated in the works. In essence, most of the types of writing are introduced within the first book, though of course subject to significant extension and modification as the cycle progresses. Through the course of the cycle, various musical ‘archetypes’ recur, including pairs of stepwise descending dyads, or passages in recurrent dotted rhythms which can be jaunty or menacing.

The chronological structure obviously gives the work the sense of a traversal through Verdi’s life and career, but the ordering also elucidates Finnissy’s changing and deeply personal perspectives on Verdi and the nature of ‘transcription’ itself over an extended period of composition. In some pieces (not least the fifth pieces in each book mentioned above), the Verdi original is clearly audible, though generally presented in a more elaborately chromatic rendering in the manner of the transcriptions of Leopold Godowsky (Finnissy said in one interview that part of the appeal of Godowsky for him was the way the slippery inner parts blurred the sense of tonality). At the other extreme one has pieces such as that after Foscari, or the final Macbeth piece, where the original exists on ‘deep background’, with no clearly identifiable allusions or surface similarities; the first of these is taken primarily from the withdrawn Piano Studies (1977-79), the second from a withdrawn work for piano and ensemble, Long Distance (1977-78); Finnissy also uses material from another withdrawn work, Guwark (1982), for part of the transcription from I masnadieri. In these cases, Finnissy is pushing the conception of ‘transcription’ to its limits, capturing an individual perspective on the moment in the opera and all it entails rather than trying to remind the listener of the actual Verdi music in question. Other works (especially in Book 2) have fleeing allusions to recognisable material, but presented in extremely fragmented, disembodied and enigmatic forms (Finnissy once described his Verdi materials as like ‘fish out of water’).

Book 1 in particular is pronouncedly ‘abstract’ in nature, and most of it could be mistaken for totally ‘original composition’ (if such a thing exists) by a listener unfamiliar with the references. However, as the total work progresses, the tonal elements become clearer and are allowed a more extended exposition, culminating especially in the works after Don Carlos, Aida and the Messa da Requiem. This illuminates deep questions for the performer that exist to some extent throughout the cycle: to what extent should they foreground the allusive elements, thus emphasising the work’s perceived rootedness in a nineteenth-century musical language, or conversely make more of the stranger, often atonal writing that generally accompanies such elements? The latter was once my general approach to this music; nowadays I have modified and relaxed my perspective a little, not least through greater recognition of the extent to which many of the more arcane elements have their own roots in ‘tradition’ as well. The works derived from Ernani and Aida always had a problematic status to me; the sheer profile and identifiability of the musical references contained therein would draw attention to themselves to such an extent as to dwarf much else that surrounds them, either in the pieces themselves or the neighbouring transcriptions. I cannot accept that this cycle (or other directly referential works of Finnissy) constitutes a blandly affirmative nostalgia trip, but have devised distinct strategies (in particular trying to give much of the atonal material a stronger profile and sense of line, as opposed to playing the tonal material with a degree of detachment) with such considerations in mind. Many have pointed out the banality of playing a Bach fugue always with one voice as the Hauptstimme; the depth of the music comes from the interaction between the voices rather than just from individual voices in isolation. This situation applies equally to Finnissy’s music, I believe.

Franz Liszt made seven important transcriptions from Verdi, while other transcriptions based on popular Verdi numbers emanated from the pens of Sigismond Thalberg, Joachim Raff, Hans von Bülow, Giuseppe Martucci and others. In more recent times both Luciano Berio and Dieter Schnebel have created more contemporary ‘transcriptions’ referring to Verdi works. Like much of his music, Finnissy’s Verdi Transcriptions are informed both by the romantic and late-romantic history of piano transcription and its performance, as well as more recent musical histories. It is equally mistaken, I believe, to view such works as an evocation of a late-romantic ‘golden age’ or as a supposedly modernistic rejection of the past. Neither a ‘golden age’ nor an era of ‘pure modernism’ ever existed in such an idealistic form; most of the romantic pianist-composers engaged in a forward-looking and dialectical manner with the conventions of their time in ways that can be seen as very ‘modern’, whilst most of the ‘modernists’ still drew upon musical traditions that preceded them.

Verdi was not really a ‘radical’ composer in the sense usually meant by the term; he worked within conventions and developed them to the maximum (as did Brahms, say). To some extent he still adhered to the 18th century notion of ‘affective’ music (as opposed to the more austere and inwardly focussed ideals of 19th century German romantics, say) – for this reason Carl Dahlhaus questions whether we should really call Verdi a ‘romantic’ composer at all. Verdi wrote in a medium, opera, upon which huge expectations were placed in terms of entertainment and the like. He was a pragmatist in various respects, accepting the confines of certain frameworks that allowed him to compose whilst individuating them towards his own needs. This may make him a relatively conservative figure in many eyes (and is probably part of the reason why many of a modernistic persuasion seem relatively aloof from Verdi’s music, indeed often from the medium of opera in general). However, to a greater or lesser degree such a situation was made necessary not just to Byrd or Monteverdi or Purcell or Bach or Mozart, but also to Beethoven or Schumann or Wagner as well, all of whom had ultimately to satisfy in one way or another the demands of either their patrons or the marketplace (which caused Schumann in particular no end of difficulties, as his publishers bemoaned the strangeness of many of his pieces, wishing him to write something more ‘accessible’ to the general public). But in the case of all these composers’, as with Verdi, the genuinely subjective was still able to assert itself within their work.

The intense stylisation of the whole medium of opera (so deeply non-naturalistic even when taking on ‘real’ events) causes problems for many. Neither Finnissy nor Verdi exploits such stylisation to mask an underlying emptiness of content. Certainly the music of both exhibits a high degree of artifice: the emotions that are presented in characters’ arias in Verdi’s early operas are indeed concentrated, exaggerated and ‘projected’, but not necessarily lacking in intimacy as a result. And the same situation applies with Finnissy’s more flamboyant writing (take the transcription from Les vêpres, for example); the contrivedly ornate writing here is accompanied by a sense of sickness and decadence within. Finnissy describes these works as most ‘theatrical’; indeed they are, but from the position of a deep understanding of the possibilities of theatre and the concept of the ‘theatrical’. The Verdi Transcriptions are stylised, flamboyant, dealing with ‘archetypal’ and possibly caricatured emotional worlds at times, but use these means to communicate something that is by no means simple.

I. Oberto. Verdi’s first opera deals with the trials of Leonora, daughter of the defeated Count Oberto, whose lover Riccardo betrays her for the sister of her father’s enemy. The aria used here is sung by Leonora after she returns from the woods where she has witnessed her father’s death at the hands of Riccardo. She calls for death at the height of her despair. Finnissy sets the main part of this piece in three voices, all in the bass register in a way that is both writhing and funereal. The top voice resembles the melody, but presented in close-packed trichords (derived from the pitch cells that make up the Verdi original). This is preceded by a series of rapid progressions in the bass that make up the Verdi original. The Verdi Transcriptions are stylised, flamboyant, dealing with ‘archetypal’ and possibly caricatured emotional worlds at times, but use these means to communicate something that is by no means simple.

II. Un giorno di Regno. Verdi’s first comedy (of only two) has a massively contrived scenario in which the Cavalier Belfiore masquerades as Stanislao, King of Poland, so the real king can travel back to Poland and seize the throne. In the meantime, two unhappy marriages are to proceed, one between the Cavalier’s daughter Giulietta and the Grand Treasurer, the other between his niece, the Marchioness of Poggio and Count Ivrea. Giulietta is in love with the young Edoardo. The Marchioness wishes to help them, but has plenty of other problems of her own. In this trio, Giulietta and Edoardo bemoan this unhelpful friend in still musical writing, whilst the Marchioness sings more rhapsodically about her own predicament (with dotted rhythms). Considering the comic nature of the opera, this is actually one of the more austere and harsh pieces in the cycle. Finnissy reworks Verdi in an extremely chromatic manner that emerges out of the Oberto material, continuously interrupted by dotted-rhythm passages (mirroring those of Verdi) before an explosive conclusion.

III. Nabucco. The opera that brought Verdi his first major success is notorious for the richness of its choral writing, to the extent that the part for the chorus rivals that of any individual character. Ismaele, nephew of the King of Jerusalem, attempts to address a crowd of Levites, whose land is being seized by the Babylonian king Nabucco. But the crowd denounce him as an accursed traitor. Finnissy transforms the line into a two-part canon, both parts chasing each other, with startling interruptions, reinventing the Verdi as a type of rather amusing high camp.

IV. I Lombardi. A chorus of Crusading Knights, attempting to march on Jerusalem, point out to the hero Arvino, that his brother Pagano has been seen nearby (actually he is in the disguise of a Hermit, and Arvino has already encountered him). Pagano is Arvino’s rival for the same woman, Viclinda, and who had tried to kill Arvino when Viclinda accepted. This regular staccato chorus appears in semi-staccato polyrhythmic interludes, again in a two-part canon, surrounded by more abstract staccato material that will set the basis for subsequent numbers in the cycle.
Verdi, Aria: ‘Sciagurata! a questo lido ricercai l’amante infido!’, Oberto (Act 2).

Verdi, Chorus: ‘Il maledetto non ha fratelli’, Nabucco (Part 2).

V. Ernani. The heroine Elvira is in love with the bandit Ernani, but is betrothed to her uncle Don Silva, a Spanish grandee, and pursued by Don Carlo, King of Spain and future Holy Roman Emperor, who Ernani blames for his father’s death. She is faced by all three figures in her apartment. Don Silva picks a furious argument with Don Carlo when he discovers him in Elvira’s room, without realising who he is. When he realises he is in the presence of his King, suddenly deference takes over. In this beautiful, initially a cappella, septet, all the various characters express their differing responses to the situation at hand. Finnissy rewrites Verdi in a left-hand version reminiscent of Godowsky, whilst adding a two-part canon of abstract atonal material in the right, which interacts with and clashes with the left in an Ivesian manner.

VI. I Due Foscari. Verdi’s first opera after Byron deals with the plight of Jacopo Foscari, to be forced into exile at the behest of his own father the octogenarian Doge, much to the dismay of Jacopo’s wife Lucrezia. Much action occurs in Act 3: after Jacopo’s departure, it is announced that a dying man has confessed to the crime for which he was indicted. Lucrezia also announces that Jacopo has dropped dead at the moment of departure, causing the elderly Doge to retreat into further despair and guilt, and hastening the pressures for his abdication, leading to his death. The Choral Barcarolle is a light-hearted number that comes near the beginning of the opera when festivities are underway during carnival time. Finnissy’s explosively violent piece would seem to portray the stormy events that are occurring simultaneously with the festivities. Only at the very end of the piece is there a glimpse of something resembling the Verdi original; all the earlier section of the piece is derived from material in the third of the now-withdrawn Piano Studies (1977-1979).
Verdi — Ernani, Act I

Vedi com'è il buon vegliar — do or del cor'l'inde.

Ah! dagli occhi un vel mi cade!

Ben di Sil - va mostrai volto
Verdi, Septet with Chorus: ‘Vedi come il buon vegliardo...’, Ernani (Part 1).
Verdi, Choral Barcarolle: ‘Tace il vento, è queta l’onda’, I Due Foscari (Act 3).

VII. Giovanna d’Arco. Joan of Arc has an almost mythical stature in France. The opera deals with both the battles with the English and (unusually for Verdi) the supernatural beings who speak to her. The aria Finnissy sets is sung by a shepherd, Giacomo, who is French but wishes to join the English, believing King Carlo VII to have brought shame upon his country (as well as wishing to cleanse the memory of a daughter who has betrayed him). Finnissy’s barren opening monophonic melody (emerging from the storm of the previous piece) is gradually brought into a two-part aperiodic counterpoint, then a short sumptuous passage which echoes the music of Scriabin and Szymanowski.

Verdi, Aria: ‘So che per via di triboli’, Giovanna d’Arco (Act 1).

VIII. Alzira. One of Verdi’s least-known operas, Alzira is set in Peru in the mid-16th century. A power struggle is going on between the Spanish colonial forces and the native Inca population, who kidnap the Governor Alvaro, but freed soon afterwards. Alzira is the betrothed of the Incan warrior, Otumbo, and she and her father are prisoners of the Spanish. She is being coerced into marrying the Spaniard Gusmano, the mortal enemy of Zamoro, the Chief of a Peruvian tribe, who had rescued Alvaro. Gusmano captures Zamoro, and holds his life in his hands. In this duet, Alzira pleads with Gusmano to save Zamoro’s life (he has been sentenced to burn at the stake). Finnissy uses the first piece from Busoni’s Indianisches Tagebuch as his basic matrix for this work, thus alluding to another composer’s setting of Native American folk melodies.

IX.  Attila.  Attila, King of the pagan Huns, has invaded Italy and sacked Aquileia. The envoy from Rome, Ezio, wishes to make a pact by which they will divide Italy between them, whereby Ezio will keep Rome, but this is rejected by Attila. Meanwhile, the Aquilieian knight Foresto bemoans that his beloved Odabella, daughter of the Lord of Aquileia, is held prisoner by Attila. Finnissy constructs a free fantasy around the aria in which Attila recounting a dream, in which an old man appeared to warn him that he is doomed unless he turns back; the composer incorporates short reminiscences of various earlier pieces in this book. The melody appears in a relatively recognisable form towards the end in the left hand, recalling the Ernani transcription; earlier it is transformed into a type of imaginary folk music in line with Finnissy’s other compositions from the time of writing.

X.  Attila.  From earlier in the opera, this relates a very heated exchange between Attila and Ezio, in which the former declares that ‘I will scatter to the winds the guilty ashes of your proud cities’ while Ezio proclaims that he will continue to hold the city of Rome. After a whirlwind introduction suggesting inflated passions, Finnissy intersperses material contrasting violent dissonance with hushed moments of sensuousness, also with playful and perhaps rather petty exchanges between the hands.

XI. Macbeth (1847). The story of Macbeth is familiar. This first transcription from the work is of the chorus of the exiles from Macbeth’s tyrannical rule in Scotland. A subdued but dignified number in the early version of Verdi’s opera, assembled from a series of disconnected fragments (some alluding to elsewhere in the cycle), from which a rendition of the melody gradually emerges.

XII. I masnadieri. The first of Verdi’s operas after Schiller centres around the disaffected figure of Carlo, son of Count Massimiliano, who renounces his background and joins a group of brigands. His unscrupulous brother Francesco has fabricated a letter, purportedly from their father, stating that if Carlo returns home, he will be kept in solitary confinement and fed bread and water. This stiffens Carlo’s resolve and opens the way for Francesco to inherit his father’s title and land. Carlo’s cousin Amalia is in love with him, but after a contrivance from Francesco, she is led to believe that Carlo has been killed in fighting, and she should marry Francesco instead. The Count in reality longs to see his favourite son again. After various things are properly revealed to Amalia, she escapes from Francesco and encounters Carlo in the forest. When Carlo reveals his identity, she is overjoyed, and also recounts the ways in which she has been ill-treated by Francesco. Carlo sings in this duet of how she is safe with him, but she secretly expresses worries about what Carlo’s new life entails. Finnissy intercuts the idiom of the I Lombardi transcription with mystical and aloof writing in the treble registers (derived from the earlier withdrawn work Guwark (1982)), contrasting a representation of young recklessness with another of sensitivity and fear, the latter demonstrated by two short outbursts of reckless grace notes saturating the compass of the keyboard, in the manner found in the earlier piano works Ives and all.fall.down.

Verdi, Duetto: ‘Vanitosi! Che abietti e dormenti’, Attila (Prologo).
XIII. Jérusalem. Finnissy sets the very first recitative and duo after the overture of Verdi’s first French opera. The Count of Toulouse, before departing for the Crusades, gives his daughter Hélène in marriage to Gaston Viscount of Béarn. Gaston believes the Count killed his father. The two debate these matters in the recitative, then Gaston vows he could forget old rivalries if he was her husband (though Finnissy tellingly omits this line). The duo is a deeply romantic short vignette in which each declare the importance of the other to them before having to part. Soon afterwards other rivalries will emerge and a rival for Hélène’s affection will attempt to have Gaston killed and succeed only in murdering the Count. Finnissy uses the same type of means as in Ernani, but here with the melodic material in the treble rather than the bass.

Verdi, Duetto: ‘Qual mare, qual terra…’, I masnadieri (Parte Terza).
Verdi, Récit et Duo: ‘Non, ce bruit, ce ne’est rien…’, Jérusalem (Act 1).

XIV. Il Corsaro. Set at first on a pirates’ island in the Aegean, the character of Medora sings of her love for pirate chieftain Corrado, who is meanwhile making plans to attack the city of Corone, in the control of the Pash Seid. Her aria is ornate and almost claustrophobic in its inward focus. Finnissy presents a rather more ‘sea-sick’ version of fragments, with occasional brief moments of expansiveness.
Verdi, Romanza: ‘Non so le tetre immagini’, Il Corsaro (Act 1).

XV. La Battaglia de Legnano. The citizens of Milan have formed the Lombard League to fight German king Federico Barbarossa. However, they are being betrayed by politicians who wish to make a deal with the king, leading to numerous reprisals and vendettas. The Veronese warrior Arrigo has by Act 4 killed Barbarossa, and the Italians’ country is safe. The Inno di Vittoria is a triumphal hymn to celebrate freedom ‘from the Alps to Charybdis’. Finnissy’s boisterous transcription gives a rather more jagged picture, working the very contours of the Alpine mountains into the music.
Verdi, Inno di Vittoria: ‘Dall’Alpi a Caridi echeggi vittoria!’, La Battaglia di Legnano (Act 4).
XVI. Luisa Miller. This very short piece crystallises a whole scene and quartet in under a minute’s music (also referencing back to the rhythms of the Giovanna transcription). Luisa Miller is in love with the man she knows only as Carlo, who is actually Rodolfo, son of Count Walter. The jealous Wurm, on the Count’s retainers, reveals this to Luisa’s father in a bid to stop the marriage, asserting that such a man would never marry a village girl. Meanwhile, Count Walter wishes Rodolfo to marry the wealthy Duchess Federica, but Rodolfo cannot bring himself to love her. As the result of Wurm’s machinations, a feud begins between the Count and Miller. Rodolfo bring this to a temporary end by threatening to reveal how the Count came to power. In the beginning of the second act, Wurm tricks Luisa, whose father is in prison awaiting execution, saying that she can get him released if she writes a letter saying that she never loved Rodolfo, only his money and position, and really wants to elope with Wurm. Luisa agrees to this ‘punishment’. In the second scene of Act 2, which Finnissy sets from mid-way through, Luisa is presented to the Duchess, whilst being reminded by Wurm of the danger her father is in. Luisa sings to herself of the deceitful way she has been treated, whilst forcing herself to lie to the Duchess about her love to Rodolfo.

Verdi, Scena e Quartetto: ‘Rea fucina d’empie frodi…’, Luisa Miller (Act 2).

XVII. Stiffelio. The evangelical minister Stiffelio discovers, through the course of the opera, how he has been betrayed by his wife Lina, who is having a secret liaison with nobleman Raffaele. Lida’s father Stankar is furious and vengeful at Raffaele, vowing to kill him. The aria in question is a rare case of a ‘divorce aria’, in which Stiffelio hands divorce papers to Lida, saying from now on he will devote himself exclusively to the church. Stiffelio’s calmness and stoicism, combined with definitiveness of purpose, are contrasted with Lida’s frantic despair (later in the opera he agrees to forgive her). Finnissy uses as his matrix the First Sonatina of Busoni (not least its 3 against 5 polyrhythms) in a calm piece which nonetheless suggests some brooding beneath the surface.
Verdi, Duetto: ‘Opposto é il calle che in avvenire’, Stiffelio (Act 3).

Busoni, Sonatina No. 1.
XVIII. Rigoletto. The utterly vacuous character of the Duke is asking Rigoletto jestingly how he can get rid of the Count of Ceprano, in order that the Duke can woo the Countess, with whom he has been flirting. In characteristic fashion Rigoletto suggests prison, exile or otherwise decapitation. This arouses the fury of the Count, who is listening nearby, proclaiming revenge against Rigoletto. In a horrifying and quick passage (much nastier than Monterone’s curse later in the scene), the Count’s line disseminates amongst much of the rest of the assembled company, declaring in ominous rising chromatic figurations (amidst the festivity and the sound of the banda) how they will meet to decide how to deal with Rigoletto. The way in which hatred is presented as so infectious evidently impressed Finnissy, who rewrites this in a brash and bare-knuckled manner (once again fragmented) with a brief bizarre allusion to Stockhausen’s Klavierstück I!

XIX. Rigoletto. The Duke’s cynical aria about the fickleness of women needs no introduction. Finnissy places this, partially harmonised, in the bass, whilst using rhythms from the opening of the Oberto transcription, and similar close-packed trichords in the right hand.

Verdi, Canzone: ‘La donna è mobile’, Rigoletto (Act 3).

XX. Il trovatore. The passage being transcribed is so over-the-top in its melodrama that it is hard to watch/hear with a straight face. Leonora, lady-in-waiting to the Princess of Aragon, is pursued by the Count di Luna, in whom she has no interest whatsoever; instead she is in love with the troubadour Manrico, possible son of the gypsy woman Azucena. The Count’s baby brother was supposedly bewitched when the Count himself was a child, and the mother of Azucena was burnt as a witch in response. But the daughter kidnapped the brother and then later a skeleton was found in the place where her mother was burnt (which she recounts in horrific detail). But Azucena had inadvertently killed her own son, not the Count’s brother, and so she brought him up as her own. This is Manrico, who is vengeful towards the Count. Eventually he is captured when trying to save his mother and sentenced to death. Leonora pleads with the Count to spare Manrico – he agrees only condition she will give herself to him. Repulsed by the Count, Leonora secretly takes poison, then pledges herself to the Count. The aria set here is her ecstatic number when she knows that Manrico will be freed, even though she will die from the poison. Finnissy’s setting removes much of the emotional intensity and turns it into a very silly, somewhat fragmented number with jarring dissonances.

XXI. La traviata. In Act 3 of this opera, Violetta Valéry is seriously ill – her doctor has admitted to her maid Annina that she has only a few hours to live. She had thought her lover Alfredo had gone abroad, but he returns in her last hours. After promising that they will leave Paris together to live the rest of their lives, he realises how ill she actually is. This is the point at which the duet that Finnissy sets begins. Dramatic interchanges between Alfredo and Violetta give way to a hymn-like passage in which Violetta sings of the cruel injustice that she should die so young. Finnissy intercuts this music with sections from an earlier Traviata transcription, forming a three-part canon from one of the principal motives of the opera, in his characteristic chromatic/folk-like style.

XXII. Les vêpres siciliennes. Finnissy sets the famous Bolero (referred to in the score as a Siciliana) from Act 5 of this opera, sung by the Duchess Elena. She sings her thanks for the flowers her guests have given her. Finnissy, in between the pizzicato-like writing familiar from I Lombardi and I masnadieri, rewrites the Bolero as grotesquely over-ornate parody, with perfumed harmonies in block chords, a little in the style of Kaikhosru Shapurji Sorabji.
Verdi, Duetto: ‘È nulla, sai?’, La Traviata (Act 3).

XXIII. Simon Boccanegra (1857). The labyrinthine plot of Boccanegra is too intricate to summarise here. In the manner of the Ernani work, Finnissy sets all four sections of the final scena in Act 1 of the earlier version of the opera. The scene takes the form of a confrontation between the Doge Boccanegra and nobleman Gabriele Adorno, interrupted by Amelia, the Doge’s daughter, who describes how she was kidnapped and managed to escape, while maintaining the Doge’s innocence. The scene ends with cries for retribution.
XXIV. Aroldo. Verdi composed a new final act when revising Stiffelio to become Aroldo. This is commonly known as the ‘Loch Lomond Act’. The character of Aroldo is not a gentle evangelical minister as in Stiffelio, but instead a Saxon knight who has returned from the Crusades. The equivalent scenario occurs, but Aroldo’s forgiveness of his wife Mina comes somewhat later than that of Stiffelio for Lida. Aroldo is living with holy man Briano in seclusion in Scotland, and encounters Mina and her father Egberto (who has killed her lover) when their boat washes up on the shore. With pleas for mercy, Aroldo ultimately forgives her. Whilst the transcription is based on the Finale where Aroldo is torn between conflicting emotional forces and ultimately relents, Finnissy also works in passages from elsewhere in the opera, including Aroldo’s Act 1 tale of a man in Palestine who concealed a paper in a book that would betray secrets, ‘Vi fu in Palestina’ (a similar scenario is occurring in Aroldo’s household at the time), evocations of the cornimuse as played by shepherds (drawing upon the opening chorus, ‘Cade il giorno’, from Act 4) and of the contrapuntal prayer ‘Angiol di Dio’ sung in the same act. All of these are combined in another free fantasia which also alludes back to the Foscari transcription, and to the Busoni First Sonatina and Fantasia Contrappuntistica.

XXV. Un ballo in maschera. Verdi’s tale of the homosexual King Gustavus III of Sweden, who was murdered at a masked ball, had to be substantially modified to placate the censors. The events are instead set in Boston in 1700 (though it’s hard to perceive anything other than nominal link to America). The Governor of Boston, Riccardo, is being secretly plotted against by his enemies Sam and Tom. At the same time, he is in love with Amelia, the wife of his Creole secretary Renato. Riccardo’s page Oscar introduces the Chief Justice, who wishes Riccardo to banish a black fortune-teller, Ulrica. After a (rather too!) high-spirited defence of her by Oscar, Riccardo summons the crowd of various officials and citizens to go and visit Ulrica. In wild can-can-like fashion he and the assembled company sing of their intentions. Finnissy once more uses the Giovanna d’Arco rhythmic model, but here the music is considerably more animated.

XXVI. La forza del Destino. At the outset of this opera, Leonora, daughter of the Marquis of Calatrava, has persuaded her father that she has abandoned a foreign lover he believes unworthy of her. But secretly, she is planning to leave her home and family and elope with him. ‘Me pellegrina’ expresses her sorrows when about to part. One of the most conventionally romantic of the Verdi Transcriptions, Finnissy added a Busoni-derived coda to the earlier version (again alluding to the First Sonatina), which forms in part a bridge to the next number.
Verdi, ‘Vi fu in Palestina’, Aroldo (Act 1).

XXVII. Macbeth (1847 and 1865). Verdi replaced his brash original 1847 aria for Lady Macbeth (sung after Macbeth has gone out to arrange Banquo’s murder) with the superb ‘La luce langue’, quite hallucinatory in both text and music. Finnissy sets the two different arias one after another, presenting the first (after a short recitative) somewhat in the manner of the first Attila transcription. The second half places the melody accompanied by descending languid chromatic arpeggios, a look back to his early piano piece Romeo and Juliet are Drowning (1967, rev. 1973) and forward to the titanic descending lines which will came later in the Don Carlo transcription.

XXVIII. Macbeth (1865). The witches chorus from Act 1 of Macbeth (which Finnissy used to rehearse at the Royal Opera House) is in no way identifiable in this piece set at the very top of the keyboard, drawing almost entirely upon material from Long Distance. Finnissy constructs an alternative and wholly modern representation of witchcraft. Verdi’s melody appears submerged within dense chromatic surrounding parts only in the last few seconds.

Verdi, Chorus: ‘S’allontanarono! N’accozzeremo’, Macbeth (Act 1).

XXIX. Don Carlos. A deeply personal take on the French version of Verdi’s opera (Finnissy’s personal favourite), this piece consists of a melange of different versions of two duets between the King of Spain, Philip II and Rodrigo, Marquis of Posa. Rodrigo attempts to convince the King to be less harsh on the citizens of Flanders, whilst the king reveals his private doubts about his wife, who is secretly in love with Don Carlos. After a short interlude relating to the introduction to Act 3, Finnissy sets an early version of the duet between the Queen, Elizabeth, and Princess Eboli, who has had an affair with the King. Finnissy intercuts the Verdi material (presented in very recognisable form) with moments derived from the Un Giorno transcription.

XXX. Aida. Radamès, a young captain in the Egyptian army, is secretly in love with Aida, who is the slave of Amneris, daughter of the King of Egypt. Amneris is also in love with Radamès, leading to bitter rivalry between the two women in vastly different positions of power. Aida is torn between her love and the fate of her people. The beginning of Act 3 is set on the banks of the Nile, where Aida awaits Ramadès, who she believes is about to say farewell to her. She contemplates drowning herself in the Nile, then in ‘O ciel azzurri’ she sings of her homeland and how she will never see it again. Finnissy takes the vocal and oboe lines from the Verdi original and modifies them into a more fragile relationship, occupying the same tessitura (as in Verdi) but creating harmonic and rhythmic disturbances with each other, the oboe part encircling Aida’s line like a cobra.
Verdi, Romanza: ‘O cieli azzuri…’, Aida (Act 3).

XXXI. String Quartet. Finnissy intercuts three groups of material, each derived in an abstracted way from the scherzo and trio of the third movement, and the finale. They are a rapid and brilliant four-part 3/8 passage (somewhat more tonal than the others), a continuous singing melody surrounded by pizzicato (which alludes back to the other ‘staccato’ pieces in this cycle), and a four-part slightly mad fugue.

Verdi, String Quartet III: Prestissimo.
XXXII. Simon Boccanegra. Gabriele is feeling vengeful, believing Amelia to be the Doge’s mistress. He pleads to heaven for her heart to be restored to him. The transcription combines an elaborated right-hand cantus firmus (directly referring back to the setting from Ernani at the outset) in the with a left-hand two-part atonal canon in the manner of the Jérusalem transcription (but here evoking a Venetian lagoon), with some recitative-like material from an earlier version of this piece.

XXXIII. Don Carlo. This is much the longest of all the Verdi transcriptions. It takes as its starting point Elizabeth’s long aria at the beginning of Act 5 where she reflects on the sadness of her life, her love for Carlos, her native land of France, and how dreams are vanquished by sorrow. Initially using the notes of the melody in a drastically expanded form (very much slower than in the original, in the manner of the expansive melodies found in English Country-Tunes, Fast Dances, Slow Dances and elsewhere), Finnissy eventually interrupts this with stark dissonant gestures, and builds over a long period towards a rapid and brilliant texture, which culminates in a set of parallel descending scales in both hands covering the whole compass of the keyboard.
Verdi, Aria: ‘Cielo, pietoso, rendila’, Simon Boccanegra (Act 2)

Verdi, Aria: ‘Tu che la vanità conosci’, Don Carlo (Act 5).
XXXIV. Otello. Both this and the Falstaff transcription are relatively brief affairs – perhaps after the lacerating Don Carlo piece it seemed impossible to create extended fantasias on these two works. Finnissy first alludes briefly to the Chanson Grecque from the Act 3 ballet which is usually omitted from performances of the opera, then towards the crucial moment towards the end of the act, where Desdemona questions why Otello is now so contemptuous towards her (he believes her, falsely, to be secretly in love with Cassio, thanks to the trap laid by Iago).

Verdi, Ballet No. 3: ‘Chanson Grecque’ (Cancone Greca), Otello (Act 3).

XXXV. Falstaff. Whilst plotting revenge against Falstaff, Ford reveals his jealousy and is teased about it by Alice. Verdi’s melody is worked into a slightly austere passage from Busoni’s Fantasia Contrappuntistica.

Busoni, from Fantasia Contrappuntistica (after J.S. Bach, Die Kunst der Fuge).

XXXVI. Messa da Requiem. The cycle ends with a relatively faithful setting of the opening of Verdi’s Requiem, though never quite totally stable, culminating with a wispy, enigmatic conclusion a little like that to Finnissy’s other large-scale cycle The History of Photography in Sound.

With many thanks to Imogen Burnham, Roger Redgate, Dimitris Exarchos, and the Contemporary Music Research Unit at Goldsmith’s College, for enabling this concert to happen.

The next concert in Ian Pace’s series of the piano music of Michael Finnissy will take place on Friday, January 20th, 2017 at City, University of London. It will feature Finnissy’s complete The History of Photography in Sound over the course of the day, as part of a wider two-day (January 19-20) event celebrating Finnissy’s work.
IAN PACE is a pianist of long-established reputation, specialising in the farthest reaches of musical modernism and transcendental virtuosity, as well as a writer and musicologist focusing on issues of performance, music and society and the avant-garde. He was born in Hartlepool, England in 1968, and studied at Chetham's School of Music, The Queen's College, Oxford and, as a Fulbright Scholar, at the Juilliard School in New York. His main teacher, and a major influence upon his work, was the Hungarian pianist György Sándor, a student of Bartók.

Based in London since 1993, he has pursued an active international career, performing in 24 countries and at most major European venues and festivals. His absolutely vast repertoire of all periods focuses particularly upon music of the 20th and 21st Century. He has given world premiers of over 200 piano works, including works by Patricia de Almeida, Julian Anderson, Richard Barrett, Konrad Boehmer, Luc Brewaeys, Aaron Cassidy, James Clarke, James Dillon, Pascal Dusapin, Richard Emsley, James Erber, Brian Ferneyhough, Michael Finnissy (whose complete piano works he performed in a landmark 6-concert series in 1996), Christopher Fox, Wieland Hoban, Volker Heyn, Evan Johnson, Maxim Kolomiyets, André Laporte, Hilda Paredes, Alwynne Pritchard, Horatiu Radulescu, Lauren Redhead, Frederic Rzewski, Thoma Simaku, Howard Skempton, Gerhard Stäbler, Andrew Toovey, Serge Verstoct, Hermann Vogt, Alistair Zaldua and Walter Zimmermann. He has presented cycles of works including Stockhausen's Klavierstücke I-X, and the piano works of Ferneyhough, Fox, Kagel, Ligeti, Lachenmann, Messiaen, Radulescu, Rihm, Rzewski and Skempton. He has played with orchestras including the Orchestre de Paris under Christoph Eschenbach (with whom he premiered and recorded Dusapin’s piano concerto À Quia), the SWF Orchestra in Stuttgart under Rupert Huber, and the Dortmund Philharmonic under Bernhard Kontarsky (with whom he gave a series of very well-received performances of Ravel’s Concerto for the Left Hand). He has recorded 34 CDs; his recent recording of Michael Finnissy’s five-and-a-half hour The History of Photography in Sound (of which he gave the world premiere in London in 2001) was released by Divine Art in October 2013 to rave reviews. Forthcoming recordings will include the piano works of Brian Ferneyhough (to be released in 2017), the Piano Sonatas of Pierre Boulez, John Cage’s The Music of Changes, and the piano works of Marc Yeats. The 2016-17 season includes appearances in London, Leuven, Basel, Prague, Lisbon, and around the UK.

He is Lecturer in Music and Head of Performance at City University, London, having previously held positions at the University of Southampton and Dartington College of Arts. His areas of academic expertise include 19th century performance practice (especially the work of Liszt and Brahms), issues of music and society (with particular reference to the work of Theodor Adorno, the Frankfurt School, and their followers), contemporary performance practice and issues, music and culture under fascism, and the post-1945 avant-garde, in particular in West Germany, upon which he is currently completing a large-scale research project. He co-edited and was a major contributor the volume Uncommon Ground: The History of Photography in Sound: A Study of Sources, Techniques and Interpretation, published by Divine Art in 2013. He has also published many articles in Music and Letters, Contemporary Music Review, TEMPO, The Musical Times, The Liszt Society Journal, International Piano, Musiktexte, Musik & Ästhetik, The Open Space Magazine, as well as contributing chapters to The Cambridge History of Musical Performance, edited Colin Lawson and Robin Stowell (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2012), Collected Writings of the Orpheus Institute: Unfolding Time: Studies in Temporality in Twentieth-Century Music, edited Darla Crispin (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2009), The Modernist Legacy, edited Björn Heile (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2009), and Beckett’s Proust/Deleuze’s Proust, edited Mary Bryden and Margaret Topping (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2009). Forthcoming articles will appear in Search: Journal for New Music, and Music and Letters.
