

City Research Online

City, University of London Institutional Repository

---

Citation: Pace, I. (2022). Why is post-colonial guilt only applied to Western classical traditions? Radio 3's World of Classical reviewed. The Spectator,

This is the accepted version of the paper.

This version of the publication may differ from the final published version.

---

Permanent repository link: <https://openaccess.city.ac.uk/id/eprint/29679/>

Link to published version:

Copyright: City Research Online aims to make research outputs of City, University of London available to a wider audience. Copyright and Moral Rights remain with the author(s) and/or copyright holders. URLs from City Research Online may be freely distributed and linked to.

Reuse: Copies of full items can be used for personal research or study, educational, or not-for-profit purposes without prior permission or charge. Provided that the authors, title and full bibliographic details are credited, a hyperlink and/or URL is given for the original metadata page and the content is not changed in any way.

Striking a false note
Review, 'World of Classical', BBC Radio 3
The Spectator*, 6 August 2022

The blurb accompanying the Radio 3 series 'World of Classical', inviting on to 'join the dots between classical music traditions of the world', suggests an introduction to the field of comparative musicology. Such a noble venture – searching for commonalities in meloies, ornamentation, rhythms, use of instruments, vocal styles and techniques, and so on - would once have been a vital part of Radio 3's continued adherence to the Reithian ideals of informing and educating as well as entertaining. Jon Silpayamanant's series however resembles more a series of episodes of Late Junction, married to a moralising and historically unbalanced commentary.

Music is used to illustrate a particular view of world history from around the 8th century until the early 20th. The variety is huge: from Georgia's keening but static polyphonic rendition of the Lord's Prayer, through to the austere but highly intricate and inventive counterpoint of Guillaume de Machaut's La Messe de Notre Dame, the amorphous, unanchored and intimate sliding pitch vectors of Japanese gagaku, to the combination of Arabic-like singing with rhythmically charged accompaniment from the Ikhwani Safaa Musical Club of Zanzibar. But the commentary on many of the musics and their interrelationships consists mostly of a few basic observations about multiple use of polyphony, similar instrumentation, or their origins in dance forms.

The three episodes are 'Pious Voices and Plucked Strings', dealing with the Middle Ages, 'Courtly Dances, Imperial Advances', considering the impact of patronage and empire, and 'Nationhood and New Sounds', on music, nationalism and cultural exchange.

The first episode opens with Hildegard von Bingen's antiphon 'O frondens virga', a crucial work in the modern reinvention of Hildegard as a 12th century New Age figure, whose music became divorced from its particular philosophical and theological context. Then we're given a 1996 recording of the Armenian melody 'Zarmanali e ints' 0 with elaborations on modern string and wind instruments - as if this was what one would hear in the 8th century. There is extant musical notation from this time and place, but this did not indicate pitch, a tradition that was not codified until the 19th century. Scholars have made some deductions but knowledge remains highly uncertain to the present day.

In the recording played by the Spanish group Hesperion XX of the one surviving song of a trobairitz (female troubadour), the 12th century 'A Chantar M'er de So Q'ieu No Voldria' by Beatritz de Dia, the heavily inflected singing of Montserrat Figueras accords with today's constructions of 'expressivity' but it is speculative to project this style back to the time. Similarly, orally transmitted information about the performance of older global musics may have morphed considerably during changing social and political circumstances.

These issues are unexamined, as are many aspects of Silpayamanant's wider historical view. He uses Josquin Desprez, William Byrd or Johann Sebastian Bach mostly to make a didactic point about European composers essentially following the money, which could be said of almost any professional musician throughout history. At the end of the second episode, Silpayamanant plays Bach's organ Chorale Prelude 'Komm, heiliger Geist', BWV 651. Instead of considering the music, he employs guilt-by-association, alluding to 'the long interwoven histories of music patronage which went before him' and earlier how 'the enrichment of Europe often subsidised classical music via global exploitation' (there is little evidence of global ventures on the part of Bach's major patrons), with connections to other cultures and people sometimes 'hidden in the balance sheets of the patrons'. That the relationship between a patron and their socially inferior musician might be more tense and fraught, or that diverse patrons had different agendas, is not considered.

Such liberal application of post-colonial guilt and righteous historical judgement is applied only to Western classical traditions. When considering Ottoman classical music, Silpayamanant portrays the Empire as a forerunner of modern liberal multicultural pluralism, not a violent expansionist empire which enslaved millions from Africa and Eastern Europe. Similarly, while emphasising the number of mosques in early modern Thailand, as a result of Persian influence, Silpayamanant does not mention the 500-year history of slavery beginning in these times. The connections between these phenomena and the music of those times may be tenuous, but that is equally true in the context of the West.

The final programme is more engaging (notwithstanding the paltry coverage of Beethoven and Debussy), with a little more information on Balinese gamelan and Arabic traditions.

As an overview of a few short samples of a range of global traditions over a millennium and a half, the programme succeeds, though the view of many non-Western traditions is essentially touristic. But a more insightful engagement with the premise is possible in the time available, with selective use of music and context and more incisive critical observations on their possible interactions. Silpayamanant's programmes may prove better at alleviating some white middle class consciences than encouraging proper engagement with global classical musics.